

I have recently become aware that the FCC is reviewing new rule changes concerning Broadcast Ownership, and that a decision by the FCC will be made in June of this year. Very little has been presented to the American public concerning these deliberations and the possible decisions to be made. The fact that so little has been put forth means little input from the general public can be received by the FCC.

At present I feel expanding ownership rules to allow more television and radio stations, newspapers and cable companies to be acquired by the current Media giants does not serve in the best interest of the general public. Already I am witnessing biased reporting and in some cases censorship of individuals and causes by some media giants, ie: Fox Media and Clear Channels. I also find conflicts of interest issues arising when one companies owns too many subsidieries. I feel the old adage 'Less is More" should be applied with this decision on Broadcast Ownership. I urge you to let the public know more about the changes you maybe considering. The more input from the general public to the FCC the better for the American Broadcast Media and the better for the FCC in making an informed choice for us, the everyday viewer and listener.

Sincerely
